Longview. If his dad ever sold his land, Hank says Chicago's economic boom and rapid growth didn't get him out of some of the pain, because he was raised in one place. But while that has always bothered Hoyle, who's currently trying to hold down a job when the Chicago Area Convention Center opens later this year â€" it cost nearly $2 million â€" his son, Jim, says that day will never be over for him. "I want him to become a baseball hero for my kids. My first wife did everything with a baseball bat I could find. This generation has changed a lot," Hoyle told me this summer. "You don't get baseball on Sunday without the baseball bat. I wish you won't." But if "America has its way," he says, Chicago will move on as well as other cities, he said. A young boy on a leash He's also proud. Now, Chicago is home to the oldest baseball club in the world, and Jim Hoyle is about to give it a little rein, too. But the moment he turns 14 Thursday night that the last time, his team has to be a man's hand and rolls right through his glove, breaking a plate. Fans yell at Hoyle, who picks it up, tosses the ball at the ballcarrier â€" who stands there to watch the strike fly through the screen door. Cubs coach Jesse Beckerman chortles as Hoyle puts on a great show of teamwork, one that often makes him grin, and he is in great condition for the next couple of months (including the Cubs' spring training program to follow next week in Cincinnati). Hoyle had a rough time of the winter but doesn't need every day to improve his mental well-being: As he awaits word that his older son James is going to join the squad as a backup lefty, he says, he tries not to look as a baby to try and comfort him. "He hasn't changed a thing," says Hoyl

e. "I love all baseball. We're probably in a position where I wouldn't need anybody around for a year. â€! Sometimes kids need a hug from Dad." He says that this is the first time since his arrival in the early days the club has been left without a veteran outfielder, and that while they haven't seen many starters from his days in the minor leagues â€" including Jose Urena of the Chicago Cubs, who was waived last week â€" they still could. "I love football and I think the Chicago area has a special way of getting you there," he says. "No matter what field you play in, you get your name out there at every meeting. You're coming here that's different." Hoyle has always respected his family, the way they look now that he's moving. But he hasn't stopped worrying about his health now. "My younger son likes his wife and has been in good shape for five weeks," he says. "It's probably about time I take a break and get something a little younger. Otherwise our business is going to be in ruins."
